security,Â .Reactive power compensation in single phase AC power supply networks is an important process in meeting system operating requirements and system energy consumption and transmission losses. Reactive power compensators (RPC's) are frequently used in single-phase power supply networks, and their use is becoming more and more widespread. RPC's are used primarily to compensate for static and dynamic imbalances in single-phase power distribution systems.

A typical RPC consists of an inductor in series with the incoming line conductor and a capacitor connected in parallel with the line conductor. RPC's are required to provide compensation for several different factors. These factors include: voltage waveform distortions, transient variations in frequency, component aging, and load tap changer switching transients. Compensation for voltage waveform distortion can be accomplished by adjusting the sizing of the RPC's. Compensation for transient frequency variations can be accomplished by providing a filter bank system of individual RPC's. Both transient frequency variations and voltage waveform distortion cause problems for AC power systems. These problems can be severe enough to necessitate the drawing of valuable resources. A line current, typically the three-phase line current, will change depending upon the phase angle between line voltage and the voltage waveform. Variations in the line current result in variations in the magnitude of the conductors forming 3e33713323
